

Money Printing to Address COVID-19 Portends Hyperinflation

By T.W. Tramm

The COVID-19 pandemic has plunged economies from Europe to Japan into record debt.

To pay the bills, cash-strapped governments are simply printing money.

History tells us that excessive money-printing diminishes the value of the currency and causes prices to spiral out of control.

While economies from Yugoslavia, to Zimbabwe, to China, have, at various times, experienced severe hyperinflation, never have conditions been so ripe in so many nations around the globe.

It's significant that run-away inflation has become a universal threat because the Book of Revelation describes hyperinflation during the tribulation period:

"And I heard a voice from among the four living beings say, 'A loaf of wheat bread or three loaves of barley will cost a day's pay' (Rev. 6:6).

Meanwhile, due to growing fears about the financial system, pressure is building in the US to restart the economy, even as the former head of Health and Human Services biodefense agency warns that without a comprehensive plan to combat the virus, including masks, testing, treatment, and vaccines, the nation could face "the darkest winter in modern history."

We're living in unprecedented times. As never before, the stage is being set for the Bible's final prophecies to be fulfilled.

What's more, the accelerated pace of the stage-setting suggests the curtain is soon to go up.
