

October 25, 2018: Birth Pains Intensifying

By T.W. tramm

OCTOBER 25, 2018—Birth pains intensifying:

The strongest storm on record to ever hit U.S. soil, Super Typhoon Yutu, just passed over the island of Tinian in Guam packing sustained winds of 178 mph.

The Dow Jones plummeted 608 points on Wednesday and the Nasdaq fell 11.7 percent—its biggest one-day drop in 7 years.

Abroad, tensions between the US, Russia and China continue to heighten.

At home, discord between rival political factions is intensifying as more pipe bombs show up at the residences of prominent Democrats, and a migrant caravan believed to be the largest on record continues its advance toward the southern border.

The recent surge of negative news in the meteorological, social, financial, and geopolitical realms raises the question: how long can things continue to escalate before the dividing line between normalcy and chaos is crossed?

The answer has profound prophetic implications as Scripture emphasizes that the Day of the Lord will begin during a time of prosperity, when things are in a state of everydayness: people will be eating, drinking, buying, selling, planting, and building (Luke 17:26-29).

If the days of normalcy are nearing an end, how much nearer must the return of the Lord be?
